TRANSCRIPT OF RECORD.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 743.

THE UNITED STATES, APPELLANTS,

vs.

THOMAS DURKIN.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

FILED APRIL 14, 1874.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 743.

THE UNITED STATES, APPELLANTS,

vs.

THOMAS DURKIN.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

INDEX.

	Original.	Print.
Petition	1	1
Traverse	2	2
Final judgment of the court	3	2
Application for allowance of an appeal	4	2
Order allowing same	4	2
Findings of fact and conclusions of law	5	3
Opinion of the court	7	3
Opinion of Chief Justice Drake	15	11
Certificate	16	11

1 In the United States Court of Claims.—December term, 1868.

[No. 6790.—Filed Nov. 7, 1872.]

To the honorable the judges of the Court of Claims:

Your petitioner, Thomas, Durkin, a citizen and resident of the city of Washington, District of Columbia, respectfully represents that he was, on the 30th day of June, A. D. 1866, employed in the civil service of the United States at Washington City, District of Columbia, as an employee in said service of the United States, in connection with and under the direction of the proper officers of the arsenal in said city; that your petitioner continued in said service as said employee, acting in the capacity of a laborer from said date until and including the 30th day of June, A. D. 1867; that during said period your petitioner was paid for his said service at the rate of two dollars per day, and was paid for said period about the sum of six hundred and twenty-six dollars.

Your petitioner further avers that by virtue of the provisions of a joint resolution of an act of Congress, approved February 28, A. D. 1867, your petitioner became and is entitled to receive, as an additional compensation for said service, a sum equal to 20 per centum of the amount paid your petitioner for his said service, computed on said sum from the 30th day of June, A. D. 1866, to June 30th, A. D. 1867, inclusive.

Your petitioner further says, that upon said computation, as provided by law, your petitioner became and is entitled to receive from the United States about the sum of one hundred and twenty-five $\frac{20}{100}$ dollars.

Your petitioner further avers that he has at all times borne true allegiance to the Government of the United States, and has not in any way voluntarily aided, abetted, or given encouragement to the rebellion against said Government; that he has made application to the proper department for payment of the claim herein stated, but without success.

Your petitioner, therefore, by reason of the premises, asks judgment for the whole amount herein claimed, to wit, about one hundred and twenty-five $\frac{20}{100}$ dollars.

CHIPMAN, HOSMER & CO.,
Solicitors for Petitioner.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
County of Washington, ss:

Personally came before me, a justice of the peace, in and for said District, Thomas Durkin, who, being duly sworn, says that he is the petitioner in the foregoing petition; that no assignment of the claim there in stated has been made, except as in said petition stated; that the amount claimed is due to the petitioner, after allowing all just offsets and credits; and that the matters and things in said petition stated are true.

THOMAS his + mark. DURKIN.

Witness:
J. B. PEYTON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 15th day of Mar., A. D. 1869.

R. H. MARSH, J. P.

2 In the Court of Claims of the United States.—December term, A. D. 1873.

THOMAS DURKIN
vs.
THE UNITED STATES. } No. 6790.—Filed Mar. 28, 1874.

And now comes the Attorney-General, on behalf of the United States, and makes answer to the petition of the claimant herein; and, not confessing the same, or any part thereof, denies each and every the allegations therein contained, and calls for strict proof of the same.

And as to so much of the said petition as sets forth and avers that the United States are indebted to the said claimant in the sum of one hundred twenty-five dollars and twenty cents, says that they are not indebted to the said claimant in the said sum of money, nor any part thereof.

And as to so much of the said petition as avers that the said claimant has at all times borne true faith and allegiance to the Government of the United States, and never voluntarily aided, abetted, or given encouragement to rebellion against the said Government, denies the said allegation.

JOHN GOFORTH,
Assistant Attorney-General.

3 In the Court of Claims.

THOMAS DURKIN
vs.
THE UNITED STATES. } 6790.

At a Court of Claims, held at the Capitol, in the city of Washington, the 30th day of March, A. D. 1874, judgment was ordered to be entered up as follows:

The court, upon due consideration of the premises, find in favor of the claimant, and do order, adjudge, and decree that the said Thomas Durkin have and recover of and from the United States the sum of one hundred and twenty-five $\frac{20}{100}$ dollars.

A true copy of record.

4 In the Court of Claims of the United States. December term, 1873.

THOMAS DURKIN
vs.
THE UNITED STATES. } No. 6790.

From the judgment rendered in the above-entitled cause, on March 30th, 1874, in favor of the claimant, the defendants, by their Attorney-General, on the 13th of April, 1874, make application for, and give notice of, an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the judgment in said case being such as will affect a class of cases.

Filed April 13, 1874.

JOHN GOFORTH,
Ass't Att'y-General.

I hereby certify that the judgement in the above cause is one which will affect a class of cases.

C. D. DRAKE, C. J.

Ordered, that the appeal be allowed as prayed for.
By the court.
APRIL 13, 1874.

5 Court of Claims.

THOMAS DURKIN
vs.
THE UNITED STATES. } 6790.

Findings of fact and conclusions of law.—Filed March 30, 1874.

This case having been heard before the chief justice and judges of the Court of Claims, at the city of Washington, on the 28th day of January, 1874, the court, after due deliberation upon the proofs and evidence given at the trial, does hereby, at the time of rendering judgment, find the following facts:

During the fiscal year beginning July 1st, 1866, and ending June 30th, 1867, the claimant was employed at the Washington arsenal, in the city of Washington, by Gen'l George D. Ramsey, commanding that post, as a laborer, upon daily wages. He was employed and paid at the same rates then paid by individuals or corporations for like services, and was thus in the service of the Government on the 28th day of February, 1867. During the fiscal year he received for his services 6 $688.20; twenty per cent. of which is $137.62.

And upon the foregoing facts, the Court of Claims, for the purposes of an appeal, decides, as

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW,

That the claimant was in the civil service of the United States within the meaning of the joint resolution 28th February, 1867, (14th Stat. L., p. 569,) and should recover twenty per cent. upon the compensation set forth in the foregoing finding.

By the court.

7 United States Court of Claims.

THE TWENTY PER CENT. CASES.—FILED MARCH 30, 1874.

GEORGE A. BELL
v.
THE UNITED STATES, (AND OTHER CASES.) }

NOTT, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

When the cases arising under that statute which has been familiarly known as the twenty per cent. resolution, February 28, 1867, (14 Stat. L., p. 569,) first came before this court, it was held that they fell into two general classes. The first, it was thought, consisted of those persons who were "in the civil service of the United States, at Washington," and whose salary or pay was "directly fixed or indirectly limited by law." The second class, it was supposed, consisted of those persons whose services were such as might be rendered to any employer; whose wages came under the restrictions of no statute or departmental regulation, and who received for their services whatever such services might be worth in the place where they were rendered. There are, indeed, services not necessarily connected with the Government as a Government, such as those of the public gardeners, but Congress have attached to them the characteristic which distinguishes the civil service from ordinary employments, namely, a fixed and arbitrary rate of compensation. Such cases, we thought, fell within the first class, not because of the nature of the services rendered, but because Congress had placed them there by making them quasi public employments.

The first class of cases (including those just referred to) was carried to the Supreme Court by appeal, and the judgment of this court affirmed. The second class has never been taken to that tribunal. But it is said that the attention of the Supreme Court was called to them upon the argument of the first, and that the broad language used in the opinion of that court was intended to cover all cases that could possibly arise under the joint resolution. The Supreme Court does indeed say that persons are "properly in the civil service, if they were employed by the head of the Department, or of the Bureau, or any division of the Department charged with that duty, and authorized to make such contracts, and fix the compensation of persons employed, even though the particular employment may not be designated in any appropriation" act And the court adds that "many persons not employed as clerks and messengers of the Departments are in the public service by virtue of an employment by the head of the Department or by the head of a Bureau of the Department authorized by law to make such contracts, and such persons are as much in the service, within the meaning of the joint resolution, as the clerks and messengers employed in the rooms of the Department building." The Twenty per cent. cases, (7 C. Cls. R., p. 290.)

8 Notwithstanding the scope of this language, and the assertion that the attention of the Supreme Court was called to the numerous classes of cases awaiting decision here, we remain of our former opinion, namely, that the cases fall into two classes: the former consisting of persons whose compensation was arbitrarily fixed or indirectly limited by Congress; the latter, of persons whose wages were unrestricted and determinable only by their highest market-value at the place where they were rendered.

As to the reasons upon which this distinction stands, it is sufficient to quote what this court formerly said in Baker's case, (4 C. Cls. R., p. 227:)

There have always been, and were when the joint resolution was passed, two classes of persons in the employment of the Government. The first consists of those whose services are special, and to be distinguished from ordinary employments. They make up the civil service of the United States, and their compensation is directly fixed, or indirectly limited, by law. The second class consists of those persons whose services are such as might be rendered to any employer; whose wages come under the restrictions of no statute, and who receive for their services whatever such services may be worth in the place where they happen to be rendered. For services which are connected with the Government, as a government, and which, being special, have no market-value, the salary, pay, or other compensation is necessarily fixed by law; but where the Government has become a builder or manufacturer, it has never attempted to regulate by law the fluctuating value of labor, which, as with other commodities, competition and the business of the country would control despite legal restriction, nor to overbid other employers in the labor-market, but has paid to its artisans and workmen the same prices for their industry which other employers might be paying for the same services in the same place. Generally this policy has been left to regulate itself between the demands of labor on the one hand, and the restraining duty of the officers charged with the hiring of workmen on the other. Occasionally it has been prescribed by law. Concerning persons in the civil service, we find in the statutes constant reference to the "pay authorized by law." In the act 23d April, 1854, (10 Stat. at L., 276,) to that of "messengers" and "watchmen" of the different Executive Departments of the Government in Washington, and to that of the "public gardener" and the "police at the Capitol;" in the act 18th August, 1856, (11 Stat. L., 145,) to that of "laborers in the employment of the Government, in the Executive Departments, and on the public grounds in the city of Washington," which, for example, the act fixes at "an annual salary of $600 each;" in the act of 14th March, 1864, (13 Stat. L., § 6,) to that of "females whom the heads of Departments are authorized to employ" "at an annual compensation not exceeding 600;" in the act 2 March, 1865, (13 Stat. L., 445, 450,) to that of "temporary clerks," with a special proviso that they "be classified according to the character of their services." But, with respect to persons not in the "civil service," we find no provisions of law regulating their pay except such as direct that "the hours of labor and the rate of wages of the employés in the navy-yards shall conform, as nearly as is consistent with the public interest, with those of private establishments in the immediate vicinity of the respective yards." Act 16th July, 1862, (12 Stat. L., 587.)

At the time when the joint resolution was passed the compensation of the great body of persons in the civil service at the seat of Government had been left for a long time unrevised, and had fallen into great disorder. By reason of the depreciation of gold and silver and the still greater 9 depreciation of paper money, wherewith these persons were paid, their compensation had become incommensurate with the increased expenses of the times, and particularly with the increased values set upon property and tenements in the city of Washington, and had fallen far behind the increase allowed by the Government to that other body of persons whose rate of compensation kept pace with that paid by private employers. Thus, the very officer of the Treasury whose decision stopped the payment of these claims, and upon whose judgment depended in this matter alone more than half a million dollars, was at that time receiving exactly the same compensation received by one of these claimants, and the average of them all fell but 30 per cent. below his salary. The salary had not been increased since 1799, (act of 2d March, 1799, 1 Stat. L., 729,) and but once since the office of Comptroller of the Treasury was established in 1789, (act 2d September, 1789, 1 Stat. L., 65.) On the contrary, it had been diminished by being paid in depreciated paper money instead of gold and silver. The members of that Congress which fixed the Comptroller's salary at $3,500 a year, themselves received but about $1,200. The per diem allowance received by them in fact amounted, for the three laborious sessions of their two years' term of office, to $2,406. But the pay of that Congress which passed this 20 per cent. resolution had advanced to $5,000 a year exclusive of mileage. The expenses of life had also more than trebled between 1799 and 1867. Taking them at the standard, we may estimate that the Comptroller's salary in 1867 should have been $9,000 a year in gold; or, taking the congressional salary at the standard, we may conclude that if the Congress which increased the pay of Comptroller in 1789 had legislated in 1867, they would have advanced the salary to $12,000 a year in Treasury notes.

A third standard of comparison may be found in the wages paid to these claimants, for it is pretty certain that the artisans of that day would not have received (in gold) a fourth part of the Comptroller's salary; whereas these have received in the average 70 per cent. of his salary, and in one case an amount exactly equal.

nature of the services rendered, but because Congress had placed them there by making them quasi public employments.

The first class of cases (including those just referred to) was carried to the Supreme Court by appeal, and the judgment of this court affirmed. The second class has never been taken to that tribunal. But it is said that the attention of the Supreme Court was called to them upon the argument of the first, and that the broad language used in the opinion of that court was intended to cover all cases that could possibly arise under the joint resolution. The Supreme Court does indeed say that persons are "properly in the civil service, if they were employed by the head of the Department, or of the Bureau, or any division of the Department charged with that duty, and authorized to make such contracts, and fix the compensation of persons employed, even though the particular employment may not be designated in any appropriation" act And the court adds that "many persons not employed as clerks and messengers of the Departments are in the public service by virtue of an employment by the head of the Department or by the head of a Bureau of the Department authorized by law to make such contracts, and such persons are as much in the service, within the meaning of the joint resolution, as the clerks and messengers employed in the rooms of the Department building." The Twenty per cent. cases, (7 C. Cls. R., p. 290.)

8 Notwithstanding the scope of this language, and the assertion that the attention of the Supreme Court was called to the numerous classes of cases awaiting decision here, we remain of our former opinion, namely, that the cases fall into two classes: the former consisting of persons whose compensation was arbitrarily fixed or indirectly limited by Congress; the latter, of persons whose wages were unrestricted and determinable only by their highest market-value at the place where they were rendered.

As to the reasons upon which this distinction stands, it is sufficient to quote what this court formerly said in Baker's case, (4 C. Cls. R., p. 227:)

There have always been, and were when the joint resolution was passed, two classes of persons in the employment of the Government. The first consists of those whose services are special, and to be distinguished from ordinary employments. They make up the civil service of the United States, and their compensation is directly fixed, or indirectly limited, by law. The second class consists of those persons whose services are such as might be rendered to any employer; whose wages come under the restrictions of no statute, and who receive for their services whatever such services may be worth in the place where they happen to be rendered. For services which are connected with the Government, as a government, and which, being special, have no market-value, the salary, pay, or other compensation is necessarily fixed by law; but where the Government has become a builder or manufacturer, it has never attempted to regulate by law the fluctuating value of labor, which, as with other commodities, competition and the business of the country would control despite legal restriction, nor to overbid other employers in the labor-market, but has paid to its artisans and workmen the same prices for their industry which other employers might be paying for the same services in the same place. Generally this policy has been left to regulate itself between the demands of labor on the one hand, and the restraining duty of the officers charged with the hiring of workmen on the other. Occasionally it has been prescribed by law. Concerning persons in the civil service, we find in the statutes constant reference to the "pay authorized by law." In the act 23d April, 1854, (10 Stat. at L., 276,) to that of "messengers" and "watchmen" of the different Executive Departments of the Government in Washington, and to that of the "public gardener" and the "police at the Capitol;" in the act 18th August, 1856, (11 Stat. L., 145,) to that of "laborers in the employment of the Government, in the Executive Departments, and on the public grounds in the city of Washington," which, for example, the act fixes at "an annual salary of $600 each;" in the act of 14th March, 1864, (13 Stat. L., § 6,) to that of "females whom the heads of Departments are authorized to employ" "at an annual compensation not exceeding 600;" in the act 2 March, 1865, (13 Stat. L., 445, 450,) to that of "temporary clerks," with a special proviso that they "be classified according to the character of their services." But, with respect to persons not in the "civil service," we find no provisions of law regulating their pay except such as direct that "the hours of labor and the rate of wages of the employés in the navy-yards shall conform, as nearly as is consistent with the public interest, with those of private establishments in the immediate vicinity of the respective yards." Act 16th July, 1862, (12 Stat. L., 587.)

At the time when the joint resolution was passed the compensation of the great body of persons in the civil service at the seat of Government had been left for a long time unrevised, and had fallen into great disorder. By reason of the depreciation of gold and silver and the still greater 9 depreciation of paper money, wherewith these persons were paid, their compensation had become incommensurate with the increased expenses of the times, and particularly with the increased values set upon property and tenements in the city of Washington, and had fallen far behind the increase allowed by the Government to that other body of persons whose rate of compensation kept pace with that paid by private employers. Thus, the very officer of the Treasury whose decision stopped the payment of these claims, and upon whose judgment depended in this matter alone more than half a million dollars, was at that time receiving exactly the same compensation received by one of these claimants, and the average of them all fell but 30 per cent. below his salary. The salary had not been increased since 1799, (act of 2d March, 1799, 1 Stat. L., 729,) and but once since the office of Comptroller of the Treasury was established in 1789, (act 2d September, 1789, 1 Stat. L., 65.) On the contrary, it had been diminished by being paid in depreciated paper money instead of gold and silver. The members of that Congress which fixed the Comptroller's salary at $3,500 a year, themselves received but about $1,200. The per diem allowance received by them in fact amounted, for the three laborious sessions of their two years' term of office, to $2,406. But the pay of that Congress which passed this 20 per cent. resolution had advanced to $5,000 a year exclusive of mileage. The expenses of life had also more than trebled between 1799 and 1867. Taking them at the standard, we may estimate that the Comptroller's salary in 1867 should have been $9,000 a year in gold; or, taking the congressional salary at the standard, we may conclude that if the Congress which increased the pay of Comptroller in 1789 had legislated in 1867, they would have advanced the salary to $12,000 a year in Treasury notes.

A third standard of comparison may be found in the wages paid to these claimants, for it is pretty certain that the artisans of that day would not have received (in gold) a fourth part of the Comptroller's salary; whereas these have received in the average 70 per cent. of his salary, and in one case an amount exactly equal.

In these intervening seventy years the daily toil of the artisan has diminished, but the labor and duties and responsibilities of the Comptroller's Office have been vastly augmented. They embrace the work of examining all accounts settled by the First and Fifth Auditors, and of certifying the balances arising thereon to the Register; of countersigning all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury which may be warranted by law; of reporting to the Secretary the official forms to be issued to the different officers for collecting the public revenue, and the manner of keeping and stating the accounts of the persons employed therein; of superintending the preservation of the public accounts subject to his revision, and providing for the payment of all moneys which may be collected; of superintending the recovery of all debts due to the United States, and directing legal proceedings to enforce their prompt payment, and of laying before Congress annually a list of such officers as shall have failed to make the settlements required by law. (Act 3d March, 1817, 3 Stat. L., 367, §§ 8, 10, 13, 14.) The single requirement that all warrants drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury "which shall be warranted by law" be countersigned by the Comptroller, obliges that officer to pass, to a certain extent, upon the legality of every payment made by the United States; and in the fiscal year to which this twenty per centum applies there were 40,814 warrants drawn, requiring of the Comptroller 40,814 signatures, given with his own hand.

But these cases furnish a further illustration. They disclose 10 forty-five bank-note printers, in a Bureau of the Treasury, whose yearly wages amounted to $111,024. The largest received by any one man was $3,500; the smallest $2,039; three of the forty-five were above $3,000; fifteen above $2,500; all but nine above $2,200. In the same Bureau the employés of the civil service who were watchmen or laborers received but $600; those who were messengers, but $840; those who were clerks but $1,200, $1,400, $1,600, $1,800. The superintendent of printing, under whom these men worked, received but $2,000; the chief of the Currency Division, by whom they were employed, but $3,000. The deputy comptroller of the currency, an official whose responsibilities are of so grave a nature that he is required by statute to give security to the amount of $50,000, received less than the wages paid to one-third of the workmen; and, finally, chiefs of divisions in the Auditor's and Comptrollers' Offices, who pass in a single year upon accounts literally embracing millions of dollars, received less than the least of these claimants.

The salaries and pay which Congress undertook to increase by law were the salaries and pay which were regulated by law. Cases, indeed, are spoken of "where no salary is fixed by law," but those were the cases of temporary clerks, persons in the civil service, and whose salaries, though not directly "fixed," were nevertheless indirectly limited by law. Persons also are enumerated in certain military and naval offices, but they were persons who, acting under military and naval authority, still were, as we held in Clark's case, (1 C. Cls. R., p. 145,) "persons engaged in the civil service." The joint resolution was not a wild gratuity, a naked, needless gift of the hard-paid taxes of the nation, but was founded on an intent to do justice to those persons in the civil service who had not been compensated justly for their services. The joint resolution was therefore a remedial statute to be construed by the well-known tests, "the old law, the mischief, and the remedy." The "old law" here was the various statutes establishing, regulating, and limiting the compensation of persons in the civil service. Where there was no old law, and employés received for their services what they were worth among men, the new law did not apply; they who had no wrongs to be righted needed not the remedy which it provided. The "mischief" was the unjust compensation which, by the changed circumstances of the nation, had come to be paid to persons in the civil service, occasioning irritation, discontent, and a sense of wrong in the minds of men, and leading to bribery, extortion, and other evil practices. The "remedy" intended by the joint resolution lies not in flinging the money of a people struggling with a great debt to those who received for their services their highest market-value, merely because such services chanced to be rendered at the seat of Government, where persons in the civil service chiefly are employed, but in faithfully extending the statute to all those actually in the "civil service of the United States," whose compensation was restricted by law, and who, being circumscribed in their means of subsistence by the arbitrary operation of law, could look only to the law for the bettering of their condition. And therefore it is that the joint resolution, though loosely and recklessly drawn, is still careful to say that the "20 per centum" to be allowed and paid shall be to "persons now employed in the civil service of the United States."

The phrase limits and controls all that follows. The "clerks, messengers, watchmen, and employés" mentioned are not all the persons employed by the Government at Washington, but only the persons employed "in the civil service" of the United States, and whose service was rendered within the functions of the offices named. These claim-11 ants were not persons in the civil service; they were simply hired by the job, or the day, to do common mechanical labor, and paid for their work all it was worth in the market. Instead of being public servants, they were merely public contractors. The Government owes them no gratuities more than it owes all other contractors, and it has paid to the least of them more than double the average which it pays to persons in the civil service at Washington. "It is the business of the judges so to construe the act as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy;" and we shall most assuredly do so if we extend it to all who are both within the letter and the spirit of the joint resolution, and to none beside.

The cases now before the court present several distinct questions additional to the general question before considered, and fall into the following classes:

I.—Plate-printers in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, in the Treasury Department.

These men were employed as printers and paid at an agreed rate for the amount of work done. They were allowed to employ assistants, who were paid from their earnings, though paid directly by the disbursing officers of the Department, the sums thus paid being deducted from the gross earnings of the claimants. The evidence before us does not show the amount of the gross earnings, but only of the balance or net earnings after the assistants had been paid. If these men are entitled to recover the twenty per cent., it seems clear to us that it must be estimated and can only be estimated upon the gross earnings paid to them by the Government. The Government was a stranger to their assistants in a legal sense, and was concerned only in the gross amount paid to them. It is not pretended that the assistants could in their turn come in and claim twenty per cent. upon the amount allowed them by their employers, the plate-printers. And it is to be noted that the net earnings in some cases exceed $3,000 per annum, and non constat, but that the gross earnings may have exceeded $3,500 per annum.

The joint resolution is limited by the terms of its second proviso to persons "whose salaries as fixed by law" do not "exceed $3,500 per annum." Did Congress ever contemplate giving twenty per cent. upon the earnings of one man whose compensation exceeded $3,500 per annum, and withholding it from another whose salary was fixed by law above that amount? We think not. The proviso indicates that the pay to be increased was pay "fixed by law;" and our conclusion is, that though these men were employés in one sense within an Executive Department, yet they were not persons "in the civil service of the United States" within the meaning of the joint resolution, but contractors whose contract work from prudential reasons was brought within the immediate supervision of an Executive Department.

II.—Laborers on the Treasury Extension.

The evidence of the Supervising Architect in this class of cases very clearly illustrates the actual existence of the legal classification which this court, as before stated, originally made. He says: "The labor performed by them was not rendered as duties of civil employés for whose services as such any appropriation for the civil service of the Government at Washington provided compensation. Specific appropriations were made for the construction of the north wing of the 12 Treasury building. Under such appropriations contracts are entered into for finished work, comprehending both materials and labor; materials separately, and labor by the day separately. The services of the parties in question were rendered under the latter contract. The consideration agreed upon for their labor was the highest market-wages. The payments upon each of these contracts were made from the specific appropriations above mentioned." We think that persons whose services were rendered under contracts for "finished work," at the "highest market-wages," cannot be considered as employés in the civil service.

III.—Laborers in the Commissary Department.

It is noticeable that while the Quartermaster's Department is enumerated in the joint resolution, and also the Commissary-General of Prisoners, yet that the Commissary Department is unnamed. These cases present the question whether the Commissary Department is a part of the Army or a Bureau of the War Department. The earlier and the later statutes generally treat the Commissary-General as simply a military officer, though there is one statute which indicates that the office is a "military bureau" of the War Department. Act 4th July, 1836, (5 Stat. L., p. 117, § 5.) The joint resolution extends to "the following-named Departments or any Bureau or division thereof," and among these Departments is the War Department. If it was intended to include under the term "Bureau" or "division" the Commissary Department, it was needless to specifically name the Quartermaster's Department. On the contrary, it is not easy to understand why it should have embraced the other military bureaus, such as the Paymaster-General, the Commissary-General of Prisoners, the Bureau of Refugees, the Quartermaster's, and have omitted the Commissary Department. If the usual rule of construction be applied, the naming of some of these military bureaus in the joint resolution must be deemed to exclude those not named. But it is at the same time a moral certainty that Congress never intended to exclude one military bureau while it benefited all the rest. The history of this piece of legislation shows that it was made up of numerous amendments, hastily thrown together, and our conclusion is that it was intended to apply to the Commissary Department.

IV.—Laborers in the Medical Department of the Army.

The same question and the same embarrassment of construction arise with regard to this class of claimants that have been pointed out in the preceding class. The Surgeon-General, in an official report on this subject, says: "The Medical Department is not made a bureau of the War Department by any law known to me. By the term 'Medical Department,' or, more correctly 'Medical Department of the Army,' is understood not a bureau or office, but the entire organization of means and appliances for conserving the health of the Army and taking care of the sick and the wounded." He adds: "The Surgeon-General's office is recognized in the annual appropriations made by Congress as a part of the War Department, but the claimant was not in the Surgeon-General's office. We think that this latter fact distinguishes these cases from the preceding, and that the parties were civil employés of the Army, and not in any sense in the civil service.

13 V.—Laborers employed by the Quartermaster's Department at Washington, but whose services were rendered at Arlington, etc.

However inconsistent it may seem for Congress to have allowed an increase of compensation to one man employed by the Quartermaster's Department, on this side of the Potomac, and to have withheld it from another, employed by the same officer, but sent to the other side of the river, it is clear that the joint resolution is limited by its terms to "persons now employed in the civil service of the United States at Washington." A person employed at Arlington is certainly not employed at Washington, although, as is claimed here, the hiring and the paying were both done in Washington. The fact that the contract of service had its inception here, and that final performance under it, that is to say, payment, was also made here, does not place the employment here; and we cannot, by any liberality of construction, extend the joint resolution to a person whose employment was elsewhere.

VI.—Employés of the Secret Service Division of the Treasury Department.

In this class the persons employed were under the direction of the Solicitor of the Treasury, and the duty performed appertained to the Treasury Department. It consisted chiefly in the detection of counterfeiters, and the parties "were stationed at no particular place except as their duties required." As we have previously held, in the case of Marche, (5 C. Cls. R., p. 525,) it was not the accidental presence of the claimant in the city of Washington which entitled him to the benefits of the joint resolution, but it was necessary that the functions of his office lie within the Treasury at the seat of Government. We do not understand that these detectives were necessarily employed here, nor, as a matter of fact, that they actually remained here. Their services were of a migratory character, and probably the smallest part of their employment was that which was rendered in Washington. Still, while liable to be sent elsewhere, they were stationed here. This was their only permanent place of official abode. Their salaries were fixed by law; they were in the civil service as assistants of the Solicitor of the Treasury; and they were in the civil service in a greater or less degree at Washington. Our conclusion is that they are entitled to recover.

VII.—Cases where the statute of limitations is pleaded.

A large number of the cases now before the court, including some in the preceding classes, were not brought until the 30th of June, 1873. The defendants set up the statute of limitations as to the eleven-twelfths of each demand. It is conceded that the suit was brought in time, so far as the last month's pay is involved, but it is insisted that the suit is barred as to all pay accruing before the first day of June, 1867. If the joint resolution, contrary to our construction of it, extends to all employés of the Government, as well as to those in the civil service proper, it is evident that this theory of monthly payments cannot be universally applied. Some of the men were employed by the day, and some by the piece, and the question must arise whether a cause of action accrued to them strictly, as each day's work was done, or each piece of work finished, or whether there was a running account extending to the date of the last item. But with regard to those persons actually in the civil service, and entitled beyond question to the benefits of the joint resolution, it is undeniable that their salaries were generally paid monthly. But on 14 looking into the statutes we do not find that there is any provision of law to that effect. The salaries are almost invariably spoken of as "annual salaries." Occasionally there is some provision, as in the case of the judiciary, that they be paid quarterly; but ordinarily the time of payment is not fixed by law. Further than this, the joint resolution does not designate a time of payment. "There shall be allowed and paid," it says, "an additional compensation of twenty per centum on their respective salaries as fixed by law, or, where no salary is fixed by law, upon their pay, respectively, for one year." And it further provides that where a person "shall be only entitled to receive salary or pay for a part of said year, the said twenty per centum shall be paid on the amount such person is so entitled to receive for services within said year." It is, therefore, by no means clear that any portion of the twenty per centum was payable until the expiration of the fiscal year, and we are inclined to say, for these reasons, that a party's claim did not accrue until the fiscal year had ended.

Our conclusion, consequently, is that in five of the preceding classes of cases the Government is entitled to judgment. But the language of the Supreme Court before quoted is broad enough to warrant an inferior tribunal to come to a directly opposite conclusion. We are, however, inclined to believe that the Supreme Court could not have intended that its opinion should be applied to cases so inherently different from those before it as we consider the most of the present cases to be. Nevertheless, we are not unmindful of the fact that our conclusion is not free from doubt, and that the claimants, by reason of the smallness of their respective demands, have not the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. We therefore direct a judgment to be entered pro forma against the Government in one of each class of cases, so that the correctness of our conclusions may be reviewed by the Supreme Court. The residue of the cases which have been submitted will remain under advisement until the decision of the Supreme Court in those appealed.

Judgment will be entered for the claimants under this opinion in the following cases:

George A. Bell v. The United States for	$236 86
Patrick Welsh v. The United States for	108 85
John Wild v. The United States for	124 80
James Hannan v. The United States for	84 00
O. A. Hoffman v. The United States for	143 60
Thomas Dorkin v. The United States for	137 62
Maurice Tucker v. The United States for	360 00
John Smith v. The United States for	71 00
John Donnelly v. The United States for	65 80
J. D. Townley v. The United States for	125 65
John Cullen v. The United States for	206 96
Thomas Fugitt v. The United States for	160 55
Cha's Wood v. The United States for	67 68
Timothy Craven v. The United States for	69 41

15 DRAKE, CH. J.:

I do not wish to be considered as taking part in the decision just read.

It is my opinion that the repeal of the joint resolution of February 28, 1867, left this court without jurisdiction of any action for the recovery of anything thereunder.

Filed March 30, 1874.

16 IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

THOMAS DURKIN vs. THE UNITED STATES. } No. 6790.

I, John Randolph, assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, do hereby certify that the foregoing are true transcripts of the pleadings in the above-entitled cause, and the final judgment of the court thereon; of the application of the Attorney-General for the defendants for the allowance of an appeal, as filed in the clerk's office April 13, 1874, and of the order of the court allowing the same; of the findings of fact by the court, and the conclusion of law thereon on which the court founded its judgment; of the opinion of the court, and the opinion of Chief Justice Drake.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said court at Washington this 14th day of April, 1874.

[SEAL.] JOHN RANDOLPH,
Asst. Clerk Court of Claims.

(Indorsement on cover:) No. 743. The United States vs. Thomas Durkin. Court of Claims. Filed 14th April, 1874.